

ONE

INTRODUCTION TO THE LAW OF TORTS AND HISTORICAL OVERVIEW

---

Sullivan v Moody & Others; Thompson v Connon & Others
(2001) 207 CLR 562

This case is also relevant to chapters 10, 12, 13, 15 and 16—and, indeed, to the law of torts in general.

---

The plaintiffs were fathers of children who had been examined by medical practitioners and social workers employed by the Department of Community Welfare for evidence of sexual abuse. They sued those persons, and the State of South Australia, for damages in negligence in the conduct of those examinations, which had resulted in reports that the children had been sexually abused. The plaintiffs alleged that as a result of the negligent examination, diagnosis and reporting they had suffered shock, distress, psychiatric injury and consequential personal and financial loss.

---

High Court of Australia

Gleeson CJ, Gaudron, McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ:

[48] *578 ... Professor Fleming (The Law of Torts, 9th ed (1998), p 151) said, 'no one has ever succeeded in capturing in any precise formula' a comprehensive test for determining whether there exists, between two parties, a relationship sufficiently proximate to give rise to a duty of care of the kind necessary for actionable negligence. The formula is not 'proximity'. Notwithstanding the centrality of that concept, for more than a century, in this area of discourse, and despite some later decisions in this Court which emphasised that centrality [footnote omitted], it gives little practical guidance in determining whether a duty of care exists in cases that are not analogous to cases in which a duty has been established [footnote omitted]. It expresses the nature of what is in issue, and in that respect gives focus *579 to the inquiry, but as an explanation of a process of reasoning leading to a conclusion its utility is limited. The present appeals provide an illustration of the problem. To ask whether there was a relationship of proximity between the medical practitioners who examined the children, and the fathers who were suspected of abusing the children, might be a convenient short-hand method of formulating the ultimate question in the case, but it provides no assistance in deciding how to answer the question. That is so, whether it is expressed as the ultimate test of a duty of care, or as one of a number of stages in an approach towards a conclusion on that issue.

[49] What has been described as the three-stage approach of Lord Bridge of Harwich in Caparo Industries Plc v Dickman ([1990] 2 AC 605 at 617–618) does not represent the law in Australia [footnote omitted]. Lord Bridge himself said that concepts of proximity and fairness lack the necessary precision to give them utility as practical tests, and ‘amount in effect to little more than convenient labels to attach to the features of different specific situations which, on a detailed examination of all the circumstances, the law recognises pragmatically as giving rise to a duty of care of a given scope’ (Caparo [1990] 2 AC 605 at 617–618). There is a danger that judges and practitioners, confronted by a novel problem, will seek to give the Caparo approach a utility beyond that claimed for it by its original author. There is also a danger that, the matter of foreseeability (which is often incontestable) having been determined, the succeeding questions will be reduced to a discretionary judgment based upon a sense of what is fair, and just and reasonable as an outcome in the particular case. The proximity question has already been discussed. The question as to what is fair, and just and reasonable is capable of being misunderstood as an invitation to formulate policy rather than to search for principle. The concept of policy, in this context, is often ill-defined. There are policies at work in the law which can be identified and applied to novel problems, but the law of tort develops by reference to principles, which must be capable of general application, not discretionary decision-making in individual cases.

[50] Different classes of case give rise to different problems in determining the existence and nature or scope, of a duty of care. Sometimes the problems may be bound up with the harm suffered by the plaintiff, as, for example, where its direct cause is the criminal conduct of some third party (eg, Modbury Triangle Shopping Centre Pty Ltd v Anzil (2000) 205 CLR 254). Sometimes they may arise because *580 the defendant is the repository of a statutory power or discretion (eg, Crimmins v Stevedoring Industry Finance Committee (1999) 200 CLR 1; Brodie v Singleton Shire Council (2001) 206 CLR 512). Sometimes they may reflect the difficulty of confining the class of persons to whom a duty may be owed within reasonable limits (eg, Perre v Apand Pty Ltd (1999) 198 CLR 180). Sometimes they may concern the need to preserve the coherence of other legal principles, or of a statutory scheme which governs certain conduct or relationships (eg, Hill v Van Erp (1997) 188 CLR 159 at 231, per Gummow J). The relevant problem will then become the focus of attention in a judicial evaluation of the factors which tend for or against a conclusion, to be arrived at as a matter of principle. In Donoghue v Stevenson, for example, Lord Buckmaster, in dissent, was concerned that, if the manufacturer in that case was liable, apart from contract or statute, to a consumer, then a person who negligently built a house might be liable, at any future time, to any person who suffered injury in consequence; a concern which later cases showed to have been far from fanciful (Donoghue [1932] AC 562 at 577). The problem which has caused so much difficulty in relation to the extent of tortious liability in respect of negligently constructed buildings was not only foreseeable, but foreseen, in the seminal case on the law of negligence [footnote omitted] ...

...

[53] Developments in the law of negligence over the last thirty or more years reveal the difficulty of identifying unifying principles that would allow ready solution of novel problems. Nonetheless, that does not mean that novel cases are to be decided by reference only to some intuitive sense of what is 'fair' or 'unfair'. There are cases, and this is one, where to find a duty of care would so cut across other legal principles as to impair their proper application and thus lead to the conclusion that there is no duty of care of the kind asserted.

[54] The present cases can be seen as focusing as much upon the *581 communication of information by the respondents to the appellants and to third parties as upon the competence with which examinations or other procedures were conducted. The core of the complaint by each appellant is that he was injured as a result of what he, and others, were told. At once, then, it can be seen that there is an intersection with the law of defamation which resolves the competing interests of the parties through well-developed principles about privilege and the like. To apply the law of negligence in the present case would resolve that competition on an altogether different basis (cf Spring v Guardian Assurance Plc [1995] 2 AC 296). It would allow recovery of damages for publishing statements to the discredit of a person where the law of defamation would not.

[55] More fundamentally, however, these cases present a question about coherence of the law. Considering whether the persons who reported their suspicions about each appellant owed that appellant a duty of care must begin from the recognition that those who made the report had other responsibilities. A duty of the kind alleged should not be found if that duty would not be compatible with other duties which the respondents owed ...

...

[60] *582 The circumstance that a defendant owes a duty of care to a third party, or is subject to statutory obligations which constrain the manner in which powers or discretions may be exercised, does not of itself rule out the possibility that a duty of care is owed to a plaintiff. People may be subject to a number of duties, at least provided they are not irreconcilable. A medical practitioner who examines, and reports upon the condition of, an individual, might owe a duty of care to more than one person. But if a suggested duty of care would give rise to inconsistent obligations, that would ordinarily be a reason for denying that the duty exists. Similarly, when public authorities, or their officers, are charged with the responsibility of conducting investigations, or exercising powers, in the public interest, or in the interests of a specified class of persons, the law would not ordinarily subject them to a duty to have regard to the interests of another class of persons where that would impose upon them conflicting claims or obligations.

[61] There is also a question as to the extent, and potential indeterminacy, of liability. In the case of a medical practitioner, the range of people who might foreseeably (in the sense earlier mentioned) suffer some kind of harm, as a consequence of careless diagnosis or treatment of a patient, is extensive.

[62] The statutory scheme that formed the background to the activities of the present respondents was, relevantly, a scheme for the protection of children [Community Welfare Act 1972 (SA), ss 10, 25, 91, 235a]. It required the respondents to treat the interests of the children as paramount. Their professional or statutory responsibilities involved investigating and reporting upon, allegations that the children had suffered, and were under threat of, serious harm. It would be inconsistent with the proper and effective discharge of those responsibilities that they should be subjected to a legal duty, breach of which would sound in damages, to take care to protect persons who were suspected of being the sources of that harm. The duty for which the appellants contend cannot be reconciled satisfactorily, either with the nature of the functions being exercised by the respondents, or with their statutory obligation to treat the interests of the children as paramount. As to the former, the functions of examination, and reporting, require, for their effective discharge, an investigation into the facts without apprehension as to possible adverse consequences for people in the position of the appellants or legal liability to such persons. As to the latter, the interests of the children, and those suspected of causing their harm, are diverse, and irreconcilable. That they are irreconcilable is evident when regard is had to the case in which examination of a child alleged to be a victim of abuse does not allow the examiner to form a definite opinion about whether the child has been abused, only a suspicion that it may have happened. The interests of the child, in such a case, would favour reporting that the suspicion of abuse has not been dispelled; the interests of a person suspected of the abuse would be to the opposite effect.

[63] Furthermore, the attempt by the appellants to avoid the problem of *583 the extent of potential duty and liability is unconvincing. They sought to limit it to parents. But, if it exists, why should it be so limited? If the suspected child abuser were a relative other than a parent, or a schoolteacher, or a neighbour, or a total stranger, why should that person be in a position different from that of a parent? The logical consequence of the appellants' argument must be that a duty of care is owed to anyone who is, or who might become, a suspect.

[64] A final point should be noted. The appellants do not contend that any legal right was infringed. And, once one rejects the distinction between parents and everybody else, they can point to no relationship, association, or connection, between themselves and the respondents, other than that which arises from the fact that, if the children had been abused, the appellants were the prime suspects. But that is merely the particular circumstance that gave rise to the risk that carelessness on the part of the respondents might cause them harm. Ultimately, their case rests on foreseeability; and that is not sufficient.

Conclusion

[65] The duty of care for which the appellants contend does not exist.

[66] The appeals should be dismissed with costs.

---

John Pfeiffer Pty Ltd v Rogerson

(2000) 203 CLR 503

---

Mr Rogerson claimed damages in the Supreme Court of the Australian Capital Territory for personal injury he suffered while working for John Pfeiffer Pty Ltd as a carpenter in New South Wales. Gleeson CJ, with Gaudron, McHugh, Gummow, and Hayne JJ (Kirby J concurring), determined that the principle of lex loci delicti governed all questions of substance in Australian torts involving an interstate element.

---

High Court of Australia

Gleeson CJ, Gaudron, McHugh, Gummow and Hayne JJ:

The federal context

[2] ... it is important to note that the issue arises in a federal context, and not in an international context ... Because the issues are in the Australian federal context, several preliminary but basic points should be made at the outset. First, while the phrases 'law area' and 'lex fori', adapted from the lexicon of private international law, may be used to identify each of the States and Territories which comprise the geographical area of Australia, these expressions are to be understood in the Australian federal context. Thus, each law area, if it be a State, is a component of the federation and, if it be a Territory, is a Territory of the federation. And with respect to matters that fall within federal jurisdiction, the Commonwealth of Australia is, itself, a law area. Across all these law areas there runs the common law of Australia, as modified from time to time and in various respects by the statute law of competent legislatures. Thus, 'law area' and 'lex fori' are used in a sense which involves the application by particular courts of the laws of particular legislatures and, in the case of the States and *515 Territories, those laws may reach beyond the geographical area of the State or Territory in question.

[3] Secondly, the common law of Australia includes the rules for choice of law, again subject to statutory modification. Thirdly, where those common law rules select the law of a law area other than that in which the court in question exercises jurisdiction as the law which determines the outcome of an action, generally they do so by applying the statute law of that other law area in preference to the common law. Sometimes, however, they may apply the common law in preference to statute law.<sup>1</sup> In the present case, the applicant contends that the statute law of the law area in which the events in question occurred should be applied in preference to the common law. Other and more difficult questions arise where, in the case of the States and Territories of Australia, the statute law of two law areas differs and it is sought to apply one rather than the other as the governing law. That is not this case.

...

---

1 See, eg, Anderson v Eric Anderson Radio & TV Pty Ltd (1965) 114 CLR 20.

[21] It should be noted that the term ‘tort’ is used in this context to denote not merely civil wrongs known to the common law but also acts or omissions which by statute are rendered wrongful in the sense that a civil action lies to recover damages occasioned thereby. Thus, *520 Koop v Bebb ((1951) 84 CLR 629), which will be considered shortly, involved statutes of New South Wales and Victoria, both of which substantially reproduced Lord Campbell’s Act and so gave an action in respect of wrongful death where the common law gave none ...

...

[62] In considering the rules which should apply with respect to Australian torts involving an interstate element but which are not litigated in federal jurisdiction, it is relevant to have regard to the requirement of s 118 of the Constitution that:

Full faith and credit shall be given, throughout the Commonwealth to the laws, the public Acts and records, and the judicial proceedings of every State.

[63] In its terms, s 118 does not state any rule which dictates what choice is to be made if there is some relevant intersection between legislation enacted by different States. Nor does it, in terms, state a rule which would dictate what common law choice of law rule should be adopted. It may well be, however, that s 118 (and in some cases s 117, or even s 92 in its protection of individual intercourse (AMS v AIF (1999) 199 CLR 160) deals with questions of competition between public policy choices reflected in the legislation of different States—at least by denying resort to the contention that one State’s courts may deny the application of the rules embodied in the statute law of another State on public policy grounds (cf Loucks v Standard Oil Co of New York (1918) 120 NE 198 at 202) ...

...

Lex fori v lex loci delicti

[81] Before turning to the question whether the common law choice of law rule should be the lex fori or lex loci delicti, it is necessary to recognise that the place of the tort may be ambiguous or diverse. Difficulty will arise in locating the tort when an action is brought, for example, for product liability and the product is made in State A, sold *539 in State B and consumed or used by the plaintiff in State C.<sup>2</sup> And the tort of libel may be committed in many States when a national publication publishes an article that defames a person.<sup>3</sup> These difficulties may lead to litigants seeking to frame claims in contract rather than tort ... or for breach of s 52 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) or some similar provision. Characterising such actions may be difficult and may raise questions whether the private international law rules about tort or some other rules are to be applied.<sup>4</sup>

2 Compare Distillers Co (Biochemicals) Ltd v Thompson [1971] AC 458; Buttidgeig v Universal Terminal & Stevedoring Corporation [1972] VR 626; Macgregor v Application des Gaz [1976] Qd R 175; Jacobs v Australian Abrasives Pty Ltd [1971] Tas SR 92.

3 McLean v David Syme & Co Ltd (1970) 72 SR (NSW) 513; David Syme & Co Ltd v Grey (1992) 38 FCR 303; Berezovsky v Michaels [2000] 1 WLR 1004; [2000] 2 All ER 986.

4 Collins, ‘Interaction between Contract and Tort in the Conflict of Laws’, International and Comparative Law Quarterly 16 (1967) 103; Pyles, ‘Tort and Related Obligations in Private International Law’, Recueil des Cours II (1991) 9, at pp 166–191.

[82] Moreover, even if the place of the tort can be located in a single jurisdiction, it will often enough be entirely fortuitous where the tort occurred. Why, so the argument goes, should the rights of Victorian residents injured when the car in which they are driven (by another Victorian) differ according to whether, if a driver falls asleep and the car runs off the road near the Victorian border, it does so south of Wodonga or north of Albury? But for every hard case that can be postulated if one form of universal rule is adopted, another equally hard case can be postulated if the opposite universal rule is adopted.

[83] It is as well then to compare the consequences of the application, in cases of intranational torts, of the lex loci delicti with the consequences of applying the lex fori. If the lex loci delicti is applied, subject to the possible difficulty of locating the tort, liability is fixed and certain; if the lex fori is applied, the existence, extent and enforceability of liability varies according to the number of forums to which the plaintiff may resort and according to the differences between the laws of those forums and, in cases in federal jurisdiction, according to where the court sits.

[84] From the perspective of the tortfeasor (or in many cases an insurer of the tortfeasor) application of the lex loci delicti fixes liability by reference to geography and it is, to that extent, easier to promote laws giving a favourable outcome by, for example, limiting liability. If the lex fori is applied, the tortfeasor is exposed to a spectrum of laws imposing liability.

[85] From the perspective of the victim (the plaintiff) application of the lex loci delicti can be said to make compensation depend upon the accident of where the tort was committed, whereas, if the lex fori is *540 applied, the plaintiff can resort to whatever forum will give the greatest compensation.

[86] In Australia, in all its law areas, the same common law rules apply and any relevant difference in substantive law will stem from statute. Applying the lex loci delicti will apply a single choice of law rule consistently in both federal and non-federal jurisdiction in all courts and will recognise and give effect to the predominant territorial concern of the statutes of State and Territory legislatures. These factors favour giving controlling effect to the lex loci delicti rather than the lex fori.

[87] Application of the lex loci delicti as the governing law in Australian torts involving an interstate element is similar to the approach adopted in Canada following the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Tolofson v Jensen [1994] 3 SCR 1022. Moreover and so far as the subject matter permits, it gives effect to the reasonable expectations of parties. And it is a rule which reflects the fact that the torts with which it deals are torts committed within a federation. Accordingly, the common law should now be developed so that the lex loci delicti is the governing law with respect to torts committed in Australia but which have an interstate element.

...

[102] ... The lex loci delicti should be applied by courts in Australia as the law governing all questions of substance to be determined in a proceeding arising from an intranational tort. And laws that bear upon the existence, extent or enforceability of remedies, rights and obligations should be characterised as substantive and not as procedural laws.

---

Australian Finance Direct Ltd v Director of Consumer Affairs (Vic)

[2007] HCA 57; (2008) 234 CLR 96

---

The Australian Finance Direct Ltd (AFD) contracted with three organisations to provide credit loans to people who wished to attend seminars run by these organisations, but who did not wish (or were unable) to pay the fees for the seminars in cash. The purpose of the credit was to enable the attendees to defer payment. In issue was construction of the credit provisions of the Consumer Credit (Victoria) Act 1995 (Vic), the Consumer Credit (Victoria) Code, and the Consumer Credit (Victoria) Code ss 14 and 15(B). Kirby J outlined the principles of purposive interpretation and construction of statutes.

---

High Court of Australia

Gleeson CJ, Gummow, Kirby, Hayne and Crennan JJ

Kirby J:

Purposive interpretation

[32] Purposive construction: Isolating the point of difference as to the interpretative task requires an examination of what this Court has said about the proper approach to elucidating the meaning of contested legislative language ... The correct approach demands ... an appreciation of relevant historical and other materials that cast light on the purpose of the Victorian Parliament in adopting, and giving effect to, the Code.

[33] When this purpose is understood, the resolution of the competing contentions in the appeal becomes relatively simple. Those of the Director are consonant with the statutory language and conform to the central objects of the Code, and should therefore be preferred. Those of AFD, even if arguably compatible with one reading of the words of the Code, would frustrate the attainment of those objects. They should be rejected.

[34] Starting with the text: The starting point for statutory interpretation is always the text of the written law.<sup>5</sup> It is in that text that the legislature expresses its purpose or ‘intention’. It is a mistake for courts to begin their search for the meaning of the law with judicial elaborations, ministerial statements or historical considerations.<sup>6</sup> *112 Moreover, in performing its functions, a court should never stray too far from the text, for it constitutes the authentic voice of the constitutionally legitimate lawmaker.<sup>7</sup>

---

5 Re Bolton; Ex parte Beane (1987) 162 CLR 514 at 518; Chang (2007) 234 CLR 1 at 20–21 [59].

6 See Combet v The Commonwealth (2005) 224 CLR 494 at 567 [135] where relevant authorities are collected.

7 Compare Trust Co of Australia Ltd v Commissioner of State Revenue (Qld) (2003) 77 ALJR 1019 at 1029 [68]–[69]; 197 ALR 297 at 310–311.

[35] Reasons for purposive interpretation: Nevertheless, especially in recent decades, courts of high authority,<sup>8</sup> including in Australia,<sup>9</sup> have moved away from a literal or semantic approach to statutory construction and towards a contextual and purposive approach. The reasons for this development, which has occurred at the same time in many countries of the common law, are several and complex. They include:

- › Judicial recognition of the constitutional advance of universal suffrage and the respect that is therefore to be accorded to the ‘will’ of Parliament, once it is ascertained;<sup>10</sup>
- › Judicial appreciation of the growing complexities of government in an age of detailed legal regulation;<sup>11</sup>
- › The growing understanding of the function of context and purpose in all human communication;<sup>12</sup>
- › The impetus given by numerous general<sup>13</sup> and particular<sup>14</sup> statutory provisions requiring courts to prefer a construction that promotes the purpose and object of legislation to one that merely gives effect to its grammatical words; and
- › Judicial recognition of the pragmatic truth that one price of simplification and concision in the enacted law is an increased need for courts to strive to give effect to the purpose of the lawmaker rather than resorting to the judicial lament that ‘the target of Parliamentary legislation ... has been missed’.<sup>15</sup>

[36] The acceptance of the purposive approach to the interpretation of legislation therefore represents one of the most important doctrinal shifts in the reasoning of this Court in recent times. Statutory interpretation is now a principal function of appellate and trial courts *113 around the world.<sup>16</sup> The decisions of this Court provide guidance for intermediate and trial courts throughout Australia. It must therefore take care to maintain a consistent approach. It would be unfortunate if, by its approach to particular proceedings, this Court were to suggest a return to *213 literalism, or sympathy for the view that considerations of context and purpose are now to have less attention.

[37] An important lesson of the past twenty years has been that statutory language better yields its meaning when its purpose is ascertained and taken into account in performing the task of interpretation. Normally, this obliges attention to the statutory context in which the contested ‘terms’ of the legislation appear and some consideration of the objectives that stimulated the 8 See, eg, the House of Lords in Fothergill v Monarch Airlines Ltd [1981] AC 251 at 272, 275, 280, 291.

9 Kingston v Keprose Pty Ltd (1987) 11 NSWLR 404 at 423–424, approved Bropho v Western Australia (1990) 171 CLR 1 at 20; compare Federal Commissioner of Taxation v Ryan (2000) 201 CLR 109 at 144–146 [79]–[82].

10 R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67 at 97 [94].

11 Compare White v Director of Military Prosecutions (2007) 231 CLR 570 at 595 [48].

12 Collector of Customs v Agfa-Gevaert Ltd (1996) 186 CLR 389 at 396–397, applying R v Brown [1996] AC 543 at 561.

13 Acts Interpretation Act 1901 (Cth), s 15AA; Interpretation of Legislation Act 1984 (Vic), s 35.

14 The Code, Sch 2, cl 7, cited (2006) 16 VR 131 at 161 [170]; compare Companies and Securities (Interpretation and Miscellaneous Provisions) (New South Wales) Code, s 5A, considered in Yuill (1991) 172 CLR 319 at 343–344, 348.

15 Diplock, ‘The Courts as Legislators’, in Harvey (ed), The Lawyer and Justice (1978) 263, at p 274, cited Kingston (1987) 11 NSWLR 404 at 424.

16 Frickey, ‘Structuring Purposive Statutory Interpretation—An American Perspective’, in Gotsis (ed), Statutory Interpretation: Principles and Pragmatism for a New Age (2007) 159, at p 159.

making of the contested law. Of course, the purpose to be ascertained is that of the particular provision viewed in the context of the entire statute.<sup>17</sup> Where the legislature has not spelt out this purpose in unmistakable terms, it is the responsibility of the decision-maker to use all available resources to discover it.

[38] Rejection of the former approach: In the past, courts stating the general common law rule proposed that the literal or grammatical construction of words was to be preferred unless it would produce some ambiguity or apparent anomaly or injustice, such as to justify a broader inquiry into the statutory purpose.<sup>18</sup>

[39] This Court has now rejected such preconditions. In CIC Insurance Ltd v Bankstown Football Club Ltd ((1997) 187 CLR 384 at 408 per Brennan CJ, Dawson, Toohey and Gummow JJ), four members of the Court said:

[T]he modern approach to statutory interpretation (a) insists that the context be considered in the first instance, not merely at some later stage when ambiguity might be thought to arise, and (b) uses 'context' in its widest sense to include such things as the existing state of the law and the mischief which, by legitimate means ... one may discern the statute was intended to remedy.<sup>19</sup> Instances of general words in a statute being so constrained by their context are numerous. In particular, as McHugh JA pointed out in Isherwood v Butler Pollnow Pty Ltd ((1986) 6 NSWLR 363 at 388), if the apparently plain words of a *114 provision are read in the light of the mischief which the statute was designed to overcome and of the objects of the legislation, they may wear a very different appearance. Further, inconvenience or improbability of result may assist the court in preferring to the literal meaning an alternative construction which, by the steps identified above, is reasonably open and more closely conforms to the legislative intent.<sup>20</sup>

[40] This explanation of the approach to be taken to a problem of construction has been cited, restated and applied in this Court so many times that it should be uncontroversial.<sup>21</sup> Some judges

17 Project Blue Sky Inc v Australian Broadcasting Authority (1998) 194 CLR 355 at 381 [69]; Stevens v Kabushiki Kaisha Sony Computer Entertainment (2005) 224 CLR 193 at 206–208 [30]–[34]; Carr v Western Australia (2007) 232 CLR 138 at 142–143 [5]–[7].

18 Compare Magor & St Mellons Rural District Council v Newport Corporation [1952] AC 189 at 191; Jones v Director of Public Prosecutions [1962] AC 635 at 662 per Lord Reid; Stock v Frank Jones (Tipton) Ltd [1978] 1 WLR 231 at 234–235, 237, 238; [1978] 1 All ER 948 at 951–952, 954, 955.

19 Attorney-General v Prince Ernest Augustus of Hanover [1957] AC 436 at 461, cited in K & S Lake City Freighters Pty Ltd v Gordon & Gotch Ltd (1985) 157 CLR 309 at 312, 315.

20 Cooper Brookes (Wollongong) Pty Ltd v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1981) 147 CLR 297 at 320–321.

21 See, eg, Newcastle City Council v GIO General Ltd (1997) 191 CLR 85 at 112–113; Project Blue Sky Inc v Australian Broadcasting Authority (1998) 194 CLR 355 at 381 [69], 384 [78]; Unity Insurance Brokers Pty Ltd v Rocco Pezzano Pty Ltd (1998) 192 CLR 603 at 620 [47] per Gummow J; James Hardie & Co Pty Ltd v Seltsam Pty Ltd (1998) 196 CLR 53 at 82 [74]; Wilson v Anderson (2002) 213 CLR 401 at 438 [71] per Gaudron, Gummow and Hayne JJ; Eastman v Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT) (2003) 214 CLR 318 at 328–329 [22] per McHugh J; at 368 [140] per Heydon J; Permanent Trustee Australia Ltd v FAI General Insurance Co Ltd (In liq) (2003) 214 CLR 514 at 531–532 [31]–[32] per McHugh, Kirby and Callinan JJ; AssetInsure Pty Ltd v New Cap Reinsurance Corporation Ltd (In liq) (2006) 225 CLR 331 at 361–362 [87] per Kirby and Hayne JJ.

have not been sympathetic to the purposive approach.<sup>22</sup> Some have clearly yearned for a return to the perceived simplicities of literalism,<sup>23</sup> either generally or in particular fields of law. On the whole, however, this Court has adhered to the doctrinal shift with a fair degree of consistency. In my view, there is a need for such consistency. We should avoid opportunistic reversions to the old approach of literalism which the legal mind sometimes finds congenial.<sup>24</sup>

[41] Obviously, a balance must be struck between, on the one hand, an exclusive focus on the text of legislation and, on the other, reference to extrinsic information that assists to explain its purpose. Those bound by the law will often have no access to such information. Cases do arise where the legal prescription is relatively clear on the face of the written law. To the extent that external inquiries are necessary, they obviously add to marginal costs and can sometimes occasion disputes and uncertainty which the words of the law alone would not have produced.

---

22 Esso Australia Resources Ltd v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1999) 201 CLR 49 at 99–101 [146]–[149] per Callinan J.

23 As expressed eg in Batagol v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1963) 109 CLR 243 at 251 per Kitto J.

24 Ryan (2000) 201 CLR 109 at 145–146 [82]; Palgo Holdings Pty Ltd v Gowans (2005) 221 CLR 249 at 285 [113]; Minister for Employment and Workplace Relations v Gribbles Radiology Pty Ltd (2005) 222 CLR 194 at 226–227 [88]–[89].